Passage:

Everyone makes mistakes, but what should we do when someone breaks the rules? In many schools, punishments like detention or writing sentences are common. However, are these methods really effective?

A teacher named Ms. Wang has a unique approach to discipline. Instead of traditional punishments, she asks students who have misbehaved to write about their feelings and reflect on their actions. She believes that this self-reflection can help students understand the consequences of their actions and learn from their mistakes.

One student, Li Ming, was late to class several times. Instead of giving him detention, Ms. Wang assigned him the task of writing an essay about the importance of punctuality. Li Ming wrote about the struggles he faced due to his tardiness and how it affected his academic performance. He realized the importance of being on time and made a conscious effort to change his behavior.

Another student, Zhang Wei, often talked back to his classmates. Ms. Wang asked him to write a letter of apology to the person he had offended. Zhang Wei wrote about his feelings of regret and how he planned to improve his communication skills. This experience helped him become more respectful towards others.

Ms. Wang's approach to discipline focuses on teaching students valuable life lessons rather than simply punishing them. By encouraging self-reflection and personal growth, she helps students understand the impact of their actions and motivates them to make positive changes.
